

Dec 01, 2006

Visions of sustainable schools

Visions of sustainable schools A lively group of 70 community members - school officials, teachers, parents, students, government leaders, business owners, and more - showed up at Newport high School Tuesday night to participate in a forum about the Sustainable Oregon Schools Initiative (SOSI). The voluntary program aims to put Oregon schools at the leading edge of environmental stewardship and sustainability. SOSI Coordinator Lori Porter Stole, left, chats with Oregon's Secretary of State Bill Bradbury, right, who served as keynote speaker. Other speakers included Oceanlake Elementary Principal Jack Nickerson, Siuslaw Middle School teacher Jim Grano, fisherman Jeff Fledner, Wayne Hoffman from the Mid-Coast Watersheds Council, and former Lincoln County school administrator Pat Cowan, who urged them to "work at sustaining the sustainability." Audience participated in group discussions at the end of the forum to glean more ideas. (Photos by Terry Dillman)

A lively group of 70 community members - school officials, teachers, parents, students, government leaders, business owners, and more - showed up at Newport high School Tuesday night to participate in a forum about the Sustainable Oregon Schools Initiative (SOSI). The voluntary program aims to put Oregon schools at the leading edge of environmental stewardship and sustainability. SOSI Coordinator Lori Porter Stole, left, chats with Oregon's Secretary of State Bill Bradbury, right, who served as keynote speaker. Other speakers included Oceanlake Elementary Principal Jack Nickerson, Siuslaw Middle School teacher Jim Grano, fisherman Jeff Fledner, Wayne Hoffman from the Mid-Coast Watersheds Council, and former Lincoln County school administrator Pat Cowan, who urged them to "work at sustaining the sustainability." Audience participated in group discussions at the end of the forum to glean more ideas. (Photos by Terry Dillman)